Don't Go Through That Door!

This is my Pa.

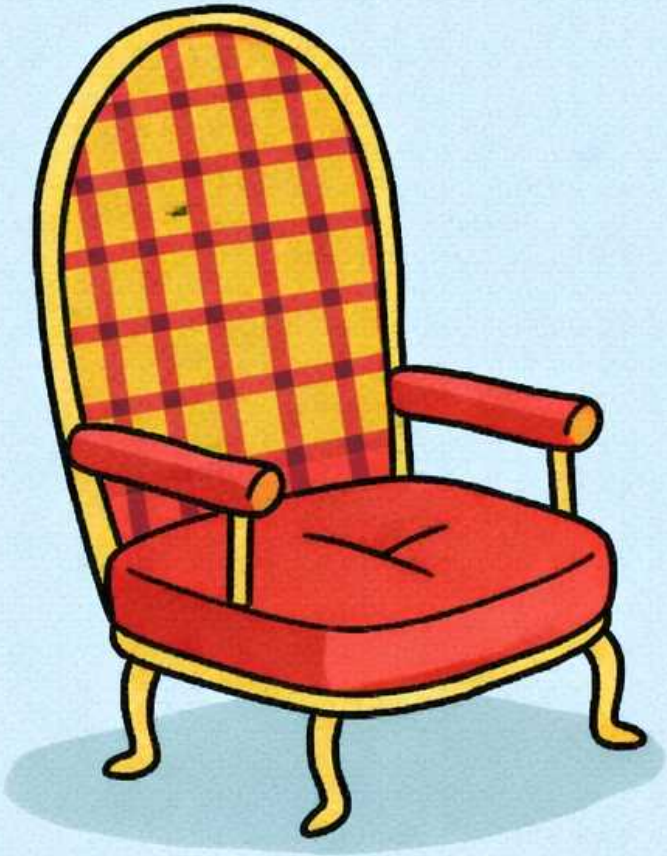
He thinks

up tall

tales.



This girl is made of air.

Wet drops fall through her. Then you can see the girl. She stands still as they land.

Then flakes land on her.

A pen paints with no hand, and the boy yells. He thinks this is a trick.

He puts paint on the girl so he can see her. He gives her two eyes and a smile. Then she is there.

He paints

the things

she likes

best.

She loves

the paint.

Now, kids see her by the things that she loves.

I ask Pa

if this is a tall tale.

He does not say.

The door

drifts wide.

Don't Go Through That Door!

Pa tells the best bedtime stories in the world - but tonight's tale is about a girl made of air. Can you really see someone who isn't there? When rain falls, when snow lands, when a green crayon starts drawing all by itself in a classroom, something strange is happening. Is it a tall tale, or is it true? And why is that bedroom door creaking open? This decodable reader practices the 'th' sound in words like 'this,' 'that,' 'then,' 'things,' and 'through.'
